The COVID-19 crisis pushes us to reassess all our procedures. How can we practise end-of-life care that is respectful of pets and pet parents as well as make sure all the necessary protective measures are in place to protect against coronavirus?

After consulting many international experts on the matter, veterinarian and Euthabag® North America Regional Director, Dr. Jocelyn Mason, will share her recommendations and tips to help you adapt your end-of-life care under the current conditions.

Speaker:

Jocelyn Mason, DVM

Dr. Mason holds a degree from Ross University, School of Veterinary Medicine and a Bachelors degree in Animal Sciences from the University of New Hampshire. Over the past 16 years she has gained expertise in private practice but has struggled to find a way to make a bigger difference in the veterinary industry. After having performed numerous unnecessary euthanasias and developing compassion fatigue, she decided to leave private practice to work for the ASPCA Animal Poison Control Centre in Illinois. In 2007, she moved to Québec where she worked in the pharmaceutical industry for several years before starting her own company in pharmacovigilance. In 2016, she decided to join the Euthabag® family, as their mission to provide respect and professionalism to our beloved animals, their families and the veterinary team, is a concept she deeply believes in. She brings a strong sense of compassion and understanding of the difficulties surrounding the euthanasia process as well as a passion in educating others on compassion fatigue. In 2019, she began lecturing at various veterinary universities on the topics of Compassion Fatigue and Improving the Euthanasia Experience. She also presented these talks at the 2019 West Indies Veterinary Conference at Ross University, her alma mater. The rest of her time is spent with her favorite little guy, her 6 year old son!
